

FBI's handling of alleged Feinstein spy spurs claims of double standard with Trump campaign

By Brooke Singman |

The FBI told Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., left, that a member of her staff was under investigation for allegations that he was providing intelligence to the Chinese government, but did not notify then-candidate Donald Trump, right, that members of his campaign were under investigation.

The FBI told Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., left, that a member of her staff was under investigation for allegations that he was providing intelligence to the Chinese government, but did not notify then-candidate Donald Trump, right, that members of his campaign were under investigation. (AP/Reuters)

Revelations that Sen. Dianne Feinstein's former driver and aide was probed by the FBI for allegedly acting as a Chinese spy have spurred claims of a double standard concerning how the bureau handled suspicions of Russian coordination with the Trump campaign.

The California Democrat, in a statement last week, said the FBI informed her of its concerns regarding the staffer in her San