Did Social Media Just Die?

Social media stocks are dropping. Buyers are not paying for Apps. Kids are turning away from the bullying and drama and BS of it all. Investors are seeing the writing in the wind. The world has realized that social media is a scam that uses them for information rather than a resource for them to use. There does not seem to be anything on social media that anyone actually needs, it is all just distraction. The abuse is beyond control. Adults see it for what it is. Silicon Valley, it's creator, is now one of the most hated places on Earth. The sexist structures of each social media company have now been exposed. What is the future of this anti-social media reality?

Let's Discuss:

Almost half of Silicon Valley's top companies have no women board members

Women board members and executives are severely lacking in Silicon Valley. Picture: ThinkStock. Source: News Limited

IT'S pretty obvious by now that Silicon Valley is a cesspool of sexism, thanks to episodes like this, this, this and this. But this is not just about programmers being programmers: The sexism reaches to the very top of the corporate structure.

Women have shamefully little representation in the executive suites and corporate boards of Silicon Valley's biggest companies, according to a new study by law firm Fenwick & West. Such gender bias is a longstanding problem for Corporate America generally, but Silicon Valley makes other companies look almost progressive in comparison.

Here's a look at the distribution of women on the boards of directors at companies in the Silicon Valley 150 (the Valley's biggest companies by sales), compared to the boards of the 100 biggest public companies in the U.S., known as the Standard & Poor's 100:

As you can see from the charts, a plurality of SV 150 companies have no women on their boards, while nearly half of the S&P 100 companies have at least two women. Two women is still a low number, but mathematics reminds us that two women is at least more than zero women. Virtually all S&P 100 companies have at least one woman on their board, while barely more than half of SV 150 even reach that bare minimum. And here's a look at how well women are represented in the executive suite:

Please first take note of the breathtaking lack of women in executive positions across the entire corporate universe. But then look at just how much worse things are in Silicon Valley: Nearly half of the SV 150 companies have no female executives at all, while 84 per cent of the S&P 500 manages to have at least one. That is an astounding number. As Fenwick points out, women account for about half of the U.S. labour force and more than half of the workers in management and other professional jobs. And yet very few women make it through the door to the executive suite - unless they work in Silicon Valley, where they'll probably never even see the door.

This dearth of women in tech means sexist culture perpetuates itself more easily. Maybe it also means our technology is not nearly as good as it could be.
