

SECRET ZUCKERBERG EMAILS REVEAL
ZUCKERBERG AND STAFF LIED TO US
CONGRESS AND BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Secret Facebook emails by Mark Zuckerberg over data-sharing scandal are seized by Parliament's Serjeant-at-Arms and could now be released by MPs despite US court ordering them to remain private

- Parliament has seized hold of private documents from the social media giant
- Files said to contain decisions made before the Cambridge Analytica Scandal
- Damian Collins demanded US software company Six4Three hand in documents

By Bhishya Patel and Alexander Robertson For Mailonline

-
-
-
-
-
-
- e-mail
-

385 shares

417

View comments

Parliament has exerted 'unprecedented' powers to seize private documents from Facebook that allegedly reveal its knowledge of the Cambridge Analytica scandal.

The secret cache is believed to include emails between Mark Zuckerberg and other executives that shows the firm knew about flaws in its privacy policy and allowed them to be actively exploited.

MPs discovered the documents were in the possession of an American software executive visiting London on a business trip and sent an official from the House of Commons to his hotel to retrieve them.

He was given two hours to hand them over to an appointee of Kamal El-Hajji, the House of Commons's serjeant-at-arms, who is responsible for the security of the parliamentary estate.

However the executive refused, and was then hauled to Parliament and warned he could face imprisonment if he did not comply.

Damian Collins, chairman of the Commons Digital, Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) Committee, told the BBC: 'We felt this [information] was highly relevant to the inquiry... and therefore we sent an order to Mr [Ted] Kramer through the serjeant at arms asking that these documents be supplied to us. Ultimately, that order was complied with.'

Mr Collins said he had read over the documents and his committee would decide this week what it intends to do with them.

Scroll down for video

 Parliament has exerted its legal powers to get hold of private Facebook documents following Mark Zuckerberg's repeated refusal to answer MPs' questions

+4

-

Parliament has exerted its legal powers to get hold of private Facebook documents following Mark Zuckerberg's repeated refusal to answer MPs' questions

 A member of staff from the office of Serjeant at Arms Kamal El-Hajji was dispatched to the hotel of Ted Kramer and demand he hand over the documents

+4

-

A member of staff from the office of Serjeant at Arms Kamal El-Hajji was dispatched to the hotel of Ted Kramer and demand he hand over the documents

It comes as MPs attempt to hold Zuckerberg and his firm to account over data breaches that affected more than 87 million Facebook users.

The documents were taken from Ted Kramer, founder of the US company Six4Three, which is currently fighting its own lawsuit with Facebook.

A US judge in California had ordered the files, obtained from Facebook via a legal discovery process, could not be revealed to the public earlier this year.

However, MPs from the culture committee, headed by MP Damian Collins, drew up an 'unprecedented' order after discovering that Mr Kramer was due to visit the UK.

RELATED ARTICLES

- Previous
- 1
- Next

- Facebook is fined £500,000 over Cambridge Analytica

scandal... Facebook boss Sheryl Sandberg slams firms for their poor...

Share this article

Share

It is believed they show how the firm created and effectively drew attention to a privacy loophole later used by Cambridge Analytica to collect the data of millions of users.

The legal move comes less than a year after the company fell into turmoil for harvesting data from 87million US users without their knowledge.

It is more bad news for Zuckerberg, who last week refused to stand down after his company was found to be using lobbyists to smear critics by calling them anti-semitic and linking them to George Soros.

 Last Monday, Damian Collins, chair of the culture, media and sport select committee, demanded US software company Six4Three hand in documents during a business trip in London +4

-

Last Monday, Damian Collins, chair of the culture, media and sport select committee, demanded US software company Six4Three hand in documents during a business trip in London

-

 Tweets by Mr Collins show his ongoing battle with chief executive Mark Zuckerberg and his company handling of data +4

-

Tweets by Mr Collins show his ongoing battle with chief executive Mark Zuckerberg and his company handling of data

The common's armed enforcer: Who is the serjeant-at-arms?

The serjeant-at-arms is responsible for the order and security of the House of Commons.

This includes maintaining order in the chamber, galleries and committee rooms of the House and controlling access to the parliamentary estate.

Whoever holds the role is responsible for carrying out the orders of the House of Commons, including making arrests.

He's also responsible for security during sittings and can be instructed by the Speaker to escort people out of the chambers - if they refuse to leave when the Speaker asks them.

They also perform ceremonial duties, including carrying the mace in the Speaker's Procession each day.

The Serjeant at Arms is the only person allowed to carry a weapon, namely a sword, in the House of Commons.

The unique role dates back to 1415, when Henry V appointed one of his royal Serjeants to keep order in Parliament.

In 2015, the current serjeant-at-arms, Kamal El-Hajji, was awarded the British Empire Medal 'for services to the Ministry of Justice'.

Mr El-Hajji has been the head of Front of House and VIP Relations at the Ministry of Justice since 2010.

The British Moroccan was the first non-white person to hold the title when he was elected in 2016.

El-Hajji made the news in June this year when he spoke out in defence of the Speaker John Bercrow.

The Serjeant at Arms said the allegations were part of a witch-hunt by 'disgruntled staff members' who want to oust him.

The US software company alleges that Facebook was aware of the loopholes in its privacy policy and exploited them.

On Friday night, Stuart Gross, a lawyer for Six4Three, confirmed to news group CNN that the British committee had obtained the sealed documents.

Mr Collins told The Guardian: 'We are in uncharted territory.

'This is an unprecedented move but it's an unprecedented situation. We've failed to get answers from and we believe the documents contain information of very high public interest.'

Six4Three are the makers of the controversial app Pinkini, that allowed users to find pictures of friends wearing bikinis online.

In 2015, Facebook changed its policies on how information was shared and this meant developers of the app were restricted in accessing data and culminated in the loss of business for Pinkini.

It was at this point the software company began their yearlong bitter feud with US social media giant.

The company claims Facebook misled developers by encouraging them to build applications based around promised access to data controls and privacy settings.

Zuckerberg had allegedly sold expensive ads to developers under the guise that they would have long-term access to users' personal information.

It happened when Facebook shifted its advertising business' focus from desktops to smartphones, the lawsuit claimed.

The recent move by Parliament comes amid the ongoing scrutiny that Facebook has fallen under regarding private data.

Since it was exposed by the Observer in March, the American company has lost more than $100billion in value.

The documents are believed to include decisions that senior executives made at the company in the years before the Cambridge Analytica scandal.

The Serjeant at arms is rarely called upon to carry out their 'enforcer' duties and there have only been a few instances reported over the years.

In 2009, the then-Serjeant at arms Jill Pay gave the green light for police to search the Westminster office of Conservative frontbencher Damian Green as part of an investigation into leaks of sensitive information from the Home Office.

She was able to give consent to police because it was her role to protect 'security in the House of Commons'.

What is the Cambridge Analytica scandal?

Consultancy firm Cambridge Analytica had offices in London, New York, Washington, as well as Brazil and Malaysia.

The company boasts it can 'find your voters and move them to action' through data-driven campaigns and a team that includes data scientists and behavioural psychologists.

In 2013, Cambridge professor Aleksandr Kogan used his app, This Is Your Digital Life, to ask 270,000 Facebook users questions about their personalities.

By answering them, the users granted Kogan access to not only their profiles but to those of their friends.

He subsequently sold that information to Cambridge Analytica for $51million.

Facebook changed its rules in 2014 to limit what data such apps could access.

A year later, the company learned that Kogan had sold his findings and contacted both him and Cambridge Analytica to tell them to delete the data which they promised to do.

In March, Facebook made its announcement that it had suspended Cambridge Analytica after being warned of looming media reports that claimed not all of the information had been destroyed.

Those reports, which were informed by the accounts of whistleblowers who worked at the firm, also revealed the true scale of the breach.

It was initially estimated that the firm was able to mine the information of 55 million Facebook users even though just 270,000 people gave them permission to do so.

But Facebook later since revealed the number was actually as high as 87 million.

The data firm suspended its chief executive, Alexander Nix, after recordings emerged of him making a series of controversial claims, including boasts that Cambridge Analytica had a pivotal role in the election of Donald Trump.

The same information is said to have been used to help the Brexit campaign in the UK.