Many women are obsessed with having "big" butts, because round, shapely butts are mainstream nowadays.

Big butts went mainstream the moment the western media and advertising worlds began portraying women with nice derrières as attractive.

You see, our primitive ancestors have been attracted to curvaceous women with round butts for millenaries.

From an evolutionary standpoint, a curvy (not to be confused with overweight!) woman, with a narrow waist, wide hips and a round butt exudes good health and fertility, the truest form of sex appeal, biologically speaking.

It doesn't. Attraction to large breasts and butts is cultural, not biological, and it's far from universal. (I prefer small breasts, for example. There are many men like me.)

Not everything has an evolutionary basis. When you have a species capable of abstract reasoning that forms complex societies, you'll end up with a lot of cultural influences on behavior.

I mean, yeah, that's indirectly evolutionary because we evolved abstract thought and the tendency to form complex societies, but you can't draw a straight line between evolutionary biology and the particular ways the cultural behaviors manifest.

No matter what else you accomplished in school, if you had that ring around your neck, you attained high, enviable status.

It is and it isn't.

It's a fad when people talk about big data as a tool that you can just plug it into your business and then it will do magic things.

means what it sounds like, large amounts of data.

It's a fad in the sense that people use the expression big data all the time to describe business problems that can be solved trivially without big data tools. People that don't work with data often have no clue.

The standard answer you would get from an evolutionary psychologist is that men look for signs of health and fertility. Big breast and buttock are certainly a sign of high estrogen, which in turn is a sign of high fertility.

I have been researching body types and temperament and there may be a high correlation between the shape of the body and the person's temperament. Feeling attracted by a certain type of body may actually make you aware of potentially compatible people. Here is the full story:
