

Google's YouTube's 'Trending' Tab is Rigged in Favor of Big Media

Study proves Google-owned video platform is deliberately burying independent creators.

A study by a student at the University of Glasgow proves that YouTube's 'trending' tab is heavily rigged in favor of big corporate media networks.

The study included 40,000 data entries and sought to answer the question "is YouTube biased towards traditional media?"

The answer is undoubtedly yes.

The study showed that independent creator Philip DeFranco, who produces a daily news show, appeared on the trending tab only twice despite amassing an average of 1.4 million views per video, while AP, which averages 10,000 views per video trended seven times.

In all, 95% of all videos from news creators that appeared on the trending tab came from legacy media outlets.

Despite having the most subscribed channel by far in the United States, PewDiePie only appeared on the trending tab in the U.S. once compared to 45 times in Canada, proving that the U.S. trending tab is being curated to exclude him.

Other creators who routinely post viral content, such as Joe Rogan, didn't trend once in the United States despite in Rogan's case trending 74 times in Canada.

Corporate network 'comedy' shows which routinely push left-wing political narratives like Jimmy Kimmel and Stephen Colbert appeared dozens of times on the trending tab.

As we have previously highlighted, YouTube openly rigs its own search engine to exclude independent news content creators, burying them under a wall of mainstream media videos.

YouTube BROKE its own search engine to game the algorithm for big media corporations.

Direct word for word searches for videos that have over 6 million views produced by independent creators now return top results from CNN, ABC & CBS.

It seems clear that the video giant has removed the 'you' from YouTube and has now set about creating CorporateTube to the detriment of the independent creators who built it in the first place.
